

First, for your video submission please:

1. State your name and the Role you are submitting for.
2. Tell us why you think you are right for the part and maybe why you want to do it
3. If there is anything you are not comfortable doing, like if you have any boundaries, let us know so there are no surprises.
4. Anything else you think would help us decide if you are right for the part, and maybe tell us something about yourself.

Second, after you finish the above submit the following scripted/improv audition:

Premise. You are conversing on FaceTime with a friend. I want to believe you are talking to me, so talk to the camera like it's your friend in front of you. Don't force anything. Be natural and 100% you. There is a reason why I asked for your first video. Don't have a "moment" or pause. Get right to it. Don't overthink it. Once you have learned the lines everything should just come out spontaneously. Bold font is improv. Regular font is the script.

YOU

Why would you say that to me? You obviously don't know me very well - maybe I haven't told you this before, but when I was about (add a 20-30 improv, a story, real-life preferably, but not required, of something personal that happened to you that had a deep effect on you, then make it flow naturally into the end of the scene. Don't rehearse the improv) so don't tell me what I know or don't know when you really have no clue what happened to me, okay?

The whole thing should last about one minute. Keep an eye on the clock. It takes skill to follow directions, knowing the lines, delivering them 100% naturally (so it doesn't sound like "acting") and still be able to hit the technical marks.

I have to believe every moment is real. You can record it several times if needed, just make sure you send the video that you think is the best representation of something real. Note: this doesn't necessarily mean you have to show tears and definitely not forced tears. I have used this with 100s of actors and it provides the best results, as each actor delivers something unique and personal.

Please submit ASAP if you want a chance to be seen in person.
